

Canada:

BofC displays little interest to change its policy posture.

The Bank of Canada left rates unchanged at today's policy meeting as was expected. The post meeting statement suggests that there is little inclination to change their rate stance in the very near term.

In their policy statement, although advancing their economic story in keeping with the improved outlook in the US and a faster than expected global recovery, really didn't advance the economic story as far as we had been expecting suggesting that there is some considerable event risk to our call for a March rate hike. Still, in terms of our forecast, we will reserve judgement until having viewed the Bank of Canada's release of its monetary policy report tomorrow before making any adjustments to our forecasts.

The facts.

In the body of the text, the Bank tweaked its outlook for growth, raising its expectations for 2011 by 1/10ppt to 2.4% and 2012 by 2/10ppt to 2.8%. No doubt a by product of a faster than expected global economic recovery and a pick up in private US demand supported by recent fiscal stimulus. The timing of a closing in the output gap is still seen as the end of 2012. Risks to the outlook remain. As expected, the strong Canadian dollar continued to attract ink out of the BoC quill, the effects of along with a poor record of productivity in Canada are seen as restraining a recovery in net exports. European sovereign and bank balance sheets are seen to limit the pace of economic recovery in Europe and are still a source of significant uncertainty. The Bank is also cautious on the pace of consumption growth in Canada given what they view as constrained household balance sheets. So too do they point to the wind down in government stimulus.

Implications

We are seeing little interest out of the BoC in this post meeting statement to move forward the rate story and assume that the Bank is content to leave responsibility for curbing the growing consumer debt problem on over to fiscal authorities. Yesterday the Canadian finance ministry released changes to the funding formulas for mortgages that included reduced amortization periods (from 35 to 30 years) and reducing the rate of financing to 85% from 90% of the value of the property as a means of curbing the growth in household debt. Federal authorities also announced that they will not longer provide insurance on personal lines of credit secured by the value of a home.

To be certain, the changes to the funding formulas for mortgage debt have raised the barriers to entry into the housing market, they have done little to change the underlying debt dynamic in Canada in the absence of a complimentary policy out of the Bank of Canada. The root cause of the debt problem in Canada is that money is cheap and available in an economy with a fully functioning banking system. Altering the calculus of a mortgage does not remove the pricing incentives that are encouraging the borrow and spend cycle while at the same time removing any incentive to save.

Bottom line

We don't get the sense that the BoC is inclined to hike rates any time soon although we will await the full fleshing out of the Bank's economic base case in tomorrow's release of its monetary policy report before making a decision on whether or not we need to alter our view on the progression of rates policy in Canada.
